CLIVE LORD MEMORIAL MEDAL 2016

The Clive Lord Memorial Medal was established in 1930.

A lecturer will be selected to deliver the Clive Lord Memorial Lecture, the recipient being a scholar distinguished for research in Tasmanian Science or History. A memorial medal will be presented.

The recipient will deliver the Clive Lord Memorial Lecture and, if not a member of the Society, will be offered free membership for one year.

- Nominations are sought from members of the Society.
- Nominators are not restricted to members of the Society.
- Self-nominations are not allowed.
- The Honours Committee of the Royal Society of Tasmania also acts as a 'Search Committee', considering names prompted by its own deliberations.

Nomination Process

Nominations will only be received in digital form.

The first page of the nomination should list:

- The name of the medal.
- The name of the candidate and contact address.
- The name of the proposer and contact address.

This should be followed by a description of the candidate's achievements relevant to the Clive Lord Medal. It should be no longer than one page and should be written concisely and in language that is widely understood outside the candidate's field of research. The candidate's contributions to science, history or other field of learning, industry or society should be clearly stated.

A full curriculum vitae should be provided in confidence. It should include the candidate's date of birth, the date of receipt of degrees, and a full list of significant published works. Where the candidate's standing relies on co-authored papers, the candidate's role in those significant papers should be indicated.

The Honours Committee of the Royal Society of Tasmania has limited ability to seek additional information and therefore depends on the nomination papers to provide a full and fair account of the candidate's suitability, taking into account the criteria of the particular medal.

Applications should be emailed to the:
